Khalaf becomes first woman to edit Financial Times in its 131-year history

KATE HOLTON
London, November 12

ROULA KHALAF WILL become the first woman to edit the Financial Times in its 131-year history after Lionel Barber said he would step down in January. Khalaf served as deputy editor, foreign editor and Middle East editor during her more than two decades at the salmon-pink newspaper. In recent years she has also sought to increase the number of female readers and journalists at the title. "It's a great honour to be appointed editor of the FT, the greatest news organisation in the world," she said. "I look forward to building on Lionel Barber's extraordinary achievements and am Tsuneo Kita, chairman of Nikkei, said Khalaf had been selected for her sound judgment and integrity. "We look forward to working closely with her to deepen our global media alliance," he said in a statement. Barber, the most senior financial journalist in the country, will step down after 14 years as editor and 34 years at the newspaper. During his time he engineered a successful push into online subscription that protected the title as others battled plummeting advertising revenue, and managed the move to a new owner after Japan's Nikkei bought the FT from Pearson in 2015. The FT passed the milestone of one million paying readers in 2019, with digital subscribers accounting for more than 75% of total circulation. As editor Barber also interviewed a raft of world leaders and most recently made headlines in June when Russia's Vladimir Putin told him that liberalism had become obsolete. The newspaper has also come under fire from some leading members of the governing Conservative Party, including Prime Minister Boris Johnson, for what they perceive to be critical coverage of Britain's vote to leave the European Union. Nikkei's Kita said Barber had transformed the FT newsroom into a digital-first operation. Describing him as a strategic thinker and true internationalist, he said it was very sad to see him leave the FT. —REUTERS

Apple card's gender-bias claims look familiar to old-school banks

BLOOMBERG
New York, November 12

APPLE PITCHES ITS new card as a model of simplicity and transparency, upending every thing consumers think about credit cards. But for the card's overseers at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., it's creating the same headaches that have bedeviled an industry the companies had hoped to disrupt. Social media postings in recent days by a tech entrepreneur and Apple co-founder Steve Wozniak complaining about unequal treatment of their wives ignited a firestorm that engulfed the two giants of Silicon Valley and Wall Street, casting a pall over what the companies had claimed was the most successful launch of a credit card ever. Goldman has said it's done nothing wrong. There's been no evidence that the bank, which decides who gets an Apple Card and how much they can borrow, intentionally discriminated against women. But that may be the point, according to critics. The complex models that guide its lending decisions may inadvertently produce results that disadvantage certain groups. The problem — in Washington it's referred to as "disparate impact" — is one the financial industry has spent years trying to address. The increasing use of algorithms in lending decisions has sharpened the years-long debate, as consumer advocates, armed with what they claim is supporting research, are pushing regulators and companies to rethink whether models are only entrenching discrimination that algorithm-driven lending is meant to stamp out. "Because machines can treat similarly-situated people and objects differently, research is starting to reveal some troubling examples in which the reality of algorithmic decision-making falls short of our expectations, or is simply wrong," Nicol Turner Lee, a fellow at the Center for Technology Innovation at the Brookings Institution, recently told Congress. Wozniak and David Heinemeier Hansson said on Twitter that their wives were given significantly lower limits on their Apple Cards, despite sharing finances and filing joint tax returns. Wozniak said he and his wife report the same income and have a joint bank account, which should mean that lenders view them as equals. Google sues London cabby who named his firm Googlye
